the Allies can recepture Rumania and Galicia, the source of all the Central Powers' petroleum supplies, with the exception of a little less than 1,000. 900 barrels a year, the war will speedily come to a close. This interesting con-clusion is drawn in a copyrighted article based on careful estimates of German petroleum needs and supplies, which will ear in the August Issue of Sinclair's against seriously, if they have not been entirely depleted. Hence the importance of any military operation involving Galician and Rumanian territory.

"A complete statement as to what damage was done in the Rumanian fields by the allied forces (prior to the occupancy of the Teuton armies) probably will not be available until after the war, but it is pretty generally understood that most of the important wells were dynamited. Unless the dynamite charges were sufficiently powerful to flood the cil bearing strata with salt water production could be restored by the simple method of drilling new wells near the old locations, assuming, of course, that the Germans could obtain an ample supply of drilling equipment. It is reason-soluble to suppose that there was more or less flooding, and there is more basis to belief that it was serious than the cohtrary."

contrary."

The writer believes that the possible maximum production of the Galician fields is at the rate of 8,000,000 barrels a year, but says that according to information considered reliable the January output was about 400,000 barrels. At this rate the annual production would be less than 8,000,000 barrels.

The estimated netroleum production be less than 5,000,000 barrels.

The estimated petroleum production available for use by the Central Powers, apart from the supplies of Rumania and Galida, he says, is less than 1,000,000 barrels a year. Excluding Rumania, therefore, the Central Powers have at their command a production of from 5,000,000 to 9,000,000 barrels a year, which, the writer says, is less than half of their real needs for war purposes. He comes to the conclusion that if Galicia and Rumania can be retaken the

He comes to the conclusion that if Galicia and Rumania can be retaken the end of the war must follow.

Sinclair's Magarine for August will also contain a copyrighted article in which are ridiculed the fears of alarmists that the supply of petroleum will soon be exhausted. The writer points out that yast supplies are still untouched.
